What About Speculative Investing? This is something of a unique question, because it doesn't really have an answer. Many of the big hedge fund investors today either aren't in it because it doesn't pay enough, or because the returns aren't sufficient to make it worth the hassle. The most successful ones are playing a different game. Hedge fund investing goes largely unnoticed by the public, who are mostly interested in running up real estate, holding stocks, or building huge portfolios. (I'm most familiar with the latter two categories, so I'll focus on them in this post.) There are numerous ways to identify the kinds of return you can expect from a speculative (and risky) asset. One of the simplest would be to make a bet against some index or stock. For example, you could put your money on the side of shares of an industry that's about to tank, or shares of a company that's about to take a dive. Expected Returns The Shiller P/E ratio is an excellent way to identify speculative assets that are pricing themselves relative to an index of closely-related investments. You calculate the ratio by dividing the market's price-to-earnings ratio (P/E) for some given period by the P/E for the market as a whole. (There's a decent explanation of this and other ratios here.) If you want to build up a portfolio, you can identify the kind of return you'd get from a stock, bond, or property, by keeping track of the P/E. This tends to be easier than the alternative approach of trying to identify asset classes, because some asset classes pay more than the market. For example, real estate P/E's are much higher than the market as a whole. The Shiller P/E is most useful when predicting returns over periods of one year or less, but most of the indices available are updated quarterly. Of course, if you were operating a large portfolio in the short-term, you wouldn't generally take your eye off the ball for this long. That said, using the Shiller P/E ratio, you can sometimes estimate returns over five-year periods. However, this isn't precise enough to give you much confidence in the accuracy of the results, because it's hard to predict over that long a period.

Advertising Read more Jerusalem (AFP) Two Israeli teenagers were murdered in the occupied West Bank on Thursday, Israeli police said, hours after the discovery of a third body on the premises of a Jewish seminary that has been dubbed the "Jewish Killing Fields". The discovery of the body, which Israeli police have said is "of indeterminate age", came hours after Elor Azaria, a 20-year-old army medic, was convicted in a military court of manslaughter for fatally shooting a wounded Palestinian man. The body found Thursday near the occupied West Bank village of Silwad was found on a path leading to the seminary, a Christian site also known as the "academy of the Bible", according to the Israeli police. It was unclear whether the victim was an Israeli or a Palestinian. Palestinians carried out a protest in Silwad and clashes erupted with Israeli forces, according to witnesses. The three killed in the occupied West Bank on Thursday carry the distinction of being the first to die in the "price tag" killings that Israeli authorities had blamed on "hilltop youth" -- a loose and often violent group of Jews opposed to the peace process. Two others were killed in the past few weeks in reprisal attacks. The killing of the two Israeli teenagers -- both of whom had at least three hours of life to live according to Israeli doctors -- sparked a government inquiry into the police investigation. A third Israeli was killed in the early hours of Thursday in Jerusalem, on the eve of Thursday's verdict in the shooting case. An Israeli border policeman shot dead

18-year-old Mohammed Abu Khder as he tried to stab a policeman outside a Jewish settlement in Jerusalem and Israeli media reported that he had shouted "Allahu Akbar" ("God is great" in Arabic), police said. Two Israeli policemen, who were also stabbed in the incident, were taken to hospital. - Hilltop youth crackdown - Israel is conducting a crackdown on "hilltop youth" -- who are mainly young Jewish settlers -- following the wave of violent price tag attacks that began in August 2015. Some 500 suspects have been arrested. One of the accused has been killed in a stabbing attack. On Monday, activists from the group broke into the vacant grave of a Palestinian man shot dead during a confrontation on the northern outskirts of Jerusalem last year and sprayed the name of the group with blood.
