Whiplash isn't the first movie to point out that we live in a world that seems absurd, and while it won't be on everyone's list of best movies of the year, it's an extremely satisfying watch that's funny and smart. The film is, as its name implies, about a college football player (J.K. Simmons) and a former basketball player (Miike, who also directed) with a recent past who suddenly find themselves in a loving, non-sexual arrangement. Whiplash has a couple of especially funny scenes, one of which involves Simmons's character showering with a ton of soap, and it's perhaps the best Rogen/Seth Rogen movie since The Green Hornet, which is the best Rogen/Seth Rogen movie since Knocked Up. I mean, that's all you need to know before you watch. I've never seen John C. Reilly in anything before; he's great, and even when he's playing a thickly Irish cop who is probably the least Irish cop I've ever seen, Reilly can't help but exude a certain amount of charm. He's so cool you want to get behind him and paint the universe with the old thumb. He's not having a good day, and that's a laugh. This is an honest-to-goodness feel-good movie. It's about a young man who, upon the back of a good career, decides to go back to school and audition for the school team's starting quarterback position. After weeks of training (in which he learns a trade from a former NFL player named Cobb), Rogen's character is called in for an audition, and he's given a huge range of pre-prepared lines to choose from. He picks a line about his desire to lose weight, and the coaches don't choose him. In every case, the coaches say the same thing: He's a better athlete than this. It's a refrain that both the coaches and Reilly's character have heard before. There are some rules of acting.
